'Infrequently, but when national interests abroad are judged by the President absolutely to require it, the clandestine service unit responsible for espionage ought to be tasked to operate in foreign countries to influence opinion, political allegiances, or alter the course of events'.

Ray S. C l i n e 'The United States in 1980's', Hoover Institution on War, Revolution, and Peace, Stanford 1980, p. 489.

Alarmed by the growing opposition in Europe to the deployment of new U.S. missiles, the Reagan administration has mounted a new effort to implement its nuclear policy.

Strict secrecy on related clandestine operations could not prevent information leaking from the services themselves.

Sources confirm:

Though specialists - like George B u s h and William C a s e y, the former and present directors of the CIA, respectively, - are holding key positions in decision making bodies, the political establishment's handling of the intelligence community has not become more professional. Irresponsible CIA operations are jeopardizing to the utmost the infrastructures of the United States and other nations.

In fact, our European partners do feel the same way. They are embarrassed to learn that mass media structures are increasingly controlled to serve U.S. administration objectives. It is not independent and objective journalism that counts, it is strict commitment and unconditional subordination to geopolitical aspects of the anti-Soviet U.S. strategy. The CIA wants to keep invisible its well devised media controlling system. The European issue of CIA-Insider contributes to lift the veil.
